Rational and Reasonable Models of Behavior. Rational and reasonable models of administrative behavior are simplified efforts to explain complex everyday processes and outcomes in organizational life. Table 1 compares the underlying dimensions that distinguish these two models. As we now discuss, they have related intellectual roots but use clearly different values, assumptions, and logics from different levels of analysis to evaluate administrative behavior.

Originally Answered: What is the difference between reasonable and rational? The "reasonableness" of something is more based on the general perceptions that people have of that thing. For example, it was deemed unreasonable to free African-Americans from slavery because the institution was deemed necessary for the economy of the South; however, it was completely a rational proposition to do so.
